And today's financial tip:

If I buy securities with my own money and then put it into a joint account at the Registry does the other named person on the account have equal rights to those securities?

Yes they do. Regardless of who purchases the securities, once they are placed in a joint account they belong equally to all the holders of the account. If you wish to be the sole owner of those securities then you would have to place them in a single account in your name.
