And today's financial tip:

What risks are involved in granting one person power to manage our joint account?

Granting one person full power to manage your joint account is called designating a primary person. This is very risky the individual can sell all your securities or make changes to your account without your knowledge or consent to the deal. If the primary person sold your securities you can only recover your money by taking the person to court. Likewise, for any other un-consented changes a remedy can only be found through the court.
