And today's financial tip:

Can an investor add another person to their account as a joint owner and what are the implications?

An investor can add anyone as a joint owner of the shares. However, it must be noted that minors are not allowed to transact business and so it is not advisable to add minors as joint owners. Once that person is added they too have the same rights to the shares as you do. If for some reason you would like to remove the person from your account as a joint owner, you would have to get the person's signed consent to have their name removed or you would have to obtain a court order granting your wish.
